1 1) If you had to predict who would be a success in life, would you take the person with the highest *IQ score, the best grades, or the strongest need to achieve? Personally, I would pick the person *motivated to do well. We all know lazy people who quite often do not achieve their goals. 2) We also know some high school graduates who did not go to college but now have their own successful companies that hire college graduates. In the long run, desire and determination exceed talent or brains.

2 The need for achievement refers to differences between individuals in their motivation to meet a variety of goals. When your need for achievement is high, 3) you are determined and focused toward success and motivated to continually evaluate and improve your performance. When properly applied, this can be an *organizing force in linking your thoughts, feelings and actions. When taken to an extreme, however, 4) it can cause failure. If you try too hard to fulfill your purposes, you go out of control and eventually give them up.

3 How the need for achievement influences us can be seen when we examine our approach to a certain *challenge. For instance, a group of people was presented with an impossible task that could not be solved. When people were told the task was (ア), those who had a high need to achieve kept trying longer than those who had a low need to achieve. Low-need achievers also kept trying, but only when they were told the task was (イ). When the low-need achievers were told the task was difficult, they were not willing to spend much time on it.
